

Nimbl unveils its 2026 shoe range, showcasing an aesthetic change while maintaining the same uncompromising performance.

The visual identity of the models, which are set to become brand classics, has been enhanced.

Nimbl has unveiled its 2026 cycling shoe range, updating the designs of some iconic models while retaining the comfort, functionality and performance that have established them as a benchmark for professionals and enthusiasts.

The new features focus on providing greater consistency and recognizability across the collection through an aesthetic refresh. The toe and heel now integrate more seamlessly with the upper and are white instead of black. The model name is displayed on the heel next to the logo to reinforce the visual identity and racing character of each Nimbl shoe.

The Glide and Air models have officially joined the PRO family. This is a natural progression for the brand, reflecting the growing popularity of these shoes among sponsored athletes. This recognition of their quality has already been proven in high-level competitions and is now further enhanced by an aesthetic that aligns with products chosen by professionals.

From a technical standpoint, the range maintains the highest performance standards. The sole is now available in three- or four-bolt configurations for every model. Ventilation, lightness and comfort remain unchanged, and the Nimbl carbon monocoque chassis ensures structural rigidity, maximizing power transfer and responsiveness with every pedal stroke.

The brand has taken another step in its journey by refining the design while maintaining the product's essence. Every cyclist now has the chance to choose shoes that combine elite performance and Italian craftsmanship with an increasingly distinctive and contemporary visual identity.

The closure systems continue to rely on BOA®, except for the Ultimate Air, which features an essential, minimalist lace-up design.

“Our products are designed to endure seasons of use. They are refined over time and through research,” says Francesco Sergio, Managing Director and Co-Founder of Nimbl. “With this year’s collection, we focused on visual identity while preserving the experience that cyclists know and value: lightness, precision and a direct connection with the bike.”

The line is available to order now on nimbl.cc and through select retailers, with progressive availability across outlets.
